

City of Seattle

Mayor Jenny A. Durkan

July 10, 2019

Alison Holcomb
Political Director, ACLU-WA
901 Fifth Ave
Suite #630
Seattle, WA 98164

RE: Community Letter Regarding Regaining Compliance with Consent Decree

Dear Community Members:

Thank you for your recent letter regarding our shared work to ensure the Seattle Police Department (SPD) remains in compliance with the Consent Decree. From the decades of work that we've done together to make progress on lasting reform, I am deeply appreciative of each and every one of you for your commitment to ensuring the City realizes true, community policing.

The City has been working diligently with our partners to begin the process for complying with the Court's order to devise a methodology for assessing the accountability regime. Over the past several weeks, I have met with the Community Police Commission (CPC), the Department of Justice (DOJ) and the Monitor, Lisa Judge, the Inspector General, and Andrew Myerberg, Director of the Office of Police Accountability, to discuss this methodology. Durable and meaningful reform requires that all of the accountability partners play a strong role during all phases of this upcoming work to bring the City fully into compliance as it relates to accountability.

Ongoing collaboration in designing the methodology for the assessment ordered by the Court, as well as community input is absolutely crucial. To help ensure this methodology is based in community input, the City filed an extension until August 15 to allow for a robust and inclusive process that incorporates a series of community meetings.

As the City has done with previous methodology reviews, the City is looking to engage a series of subject matter experts to help formulate the assessment. Both the original investigation of SPD and most of the system assessments have been done with the assistance of national experts, with subject matter expertise — whether it be use of force, biased policing or crisis intervention. These assessments, together with input by CPC, the Monitor, and other stakeholders formed the basis of Court approved plans to reform the Department. That's why it makes sense that we work with national experts to assist us using the same model, as we have throughout the Consent Decree process, to improve accountability and discipline.

The City with input from its partners is engaging 21 CP Solutions, who are national leaders in police reform efforts and served on President Obama's Task Force on 21st Century Policing. The experts were chosen for their deep and varied experience and have national reputations in policing and accountability and recently led assessments in cities and states across the country.

I have asked both the experts and the City be able to present directly to the CPC and answer questions about both the process going forward and the scope of work. There is much common ground for us to create lasting reform and strengthen our accountability and discipline systems for years to come. The CPC will meet with the national experts on July 17 to develop a framework for the methodology. The following day, July 18, the experts, City of Seattle, DOJ, CPC, and the Monitor will participate in a half-day work session to work on the methodology and the scope-of-work for the Court's order.

To be clear, this assessment will not start over the decades of work that Seattle, the Department and our community has done towards accountability. Rather, these efforts are to comply with the Court's order and to continually improve our discipline and accountability systems. The exact scope and methodology are what the City and DOJ will develop with the CPC and the Monitor's assistance. The Court, of course, has final say — and the Phase II scope of work will begin upon the Court's review and approval of the proposed methodology.

I believe our work on the Court-ordered methodology will realize our shared goals of robust community participation and ensure the SPD remains in full and effective compliance with the goals of the Consent Decree. Please let Michelle Chen, Mayor's Office General Counsel, know if you have any additional questions or feedback. Thank you for your commitment to these shared values of lasting reform.

Sincerely,

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read "Jenny A. Durkan".

Jenny A. Durkan
Mayor of Seattle